Wentworth Gardens BATTLE CREEK, MICHIGAN

How They're Grown

PLANTING

Great care is given to all operations in the culture of Wentworth Garden Corms to assure you maximum quality. Planting is done by furrowing two trenches at a time. The stock is then dropped by hand and set up in correct growing position. By using hand labor we are able to firm each root base into the ground, giving better root growth and eliminating misformed bulbs caused by crowding.

CULTIVATION

Two crops, one bulbs and the other weeds, cannot be grown in the same field at the same time. Our fields are always clean of weeds. A two-row tractor cultivator is used to obtain four results: to eliminate weeds in the center between the rows, to obtain deep mulch cultivation and to conserve moisture, to hill up the growing plants and to smother the young weeds starting growth between plants. The success of this is proven by the fact that only twice during the season must we go through the fields with a hoe.

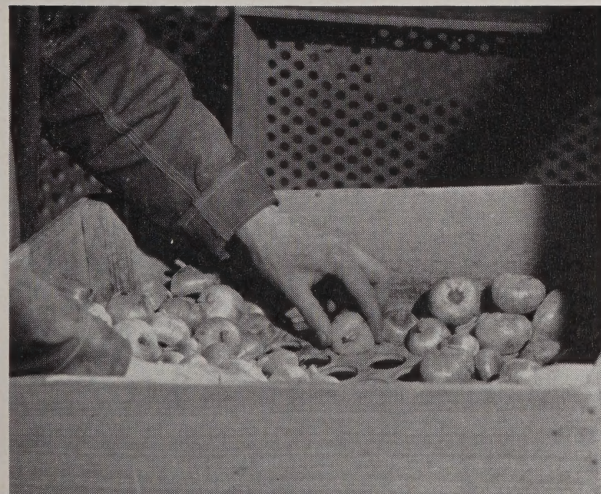

HARVEST AND STORAGE

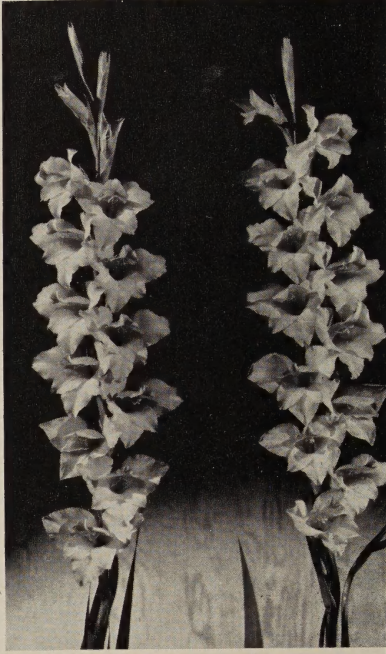

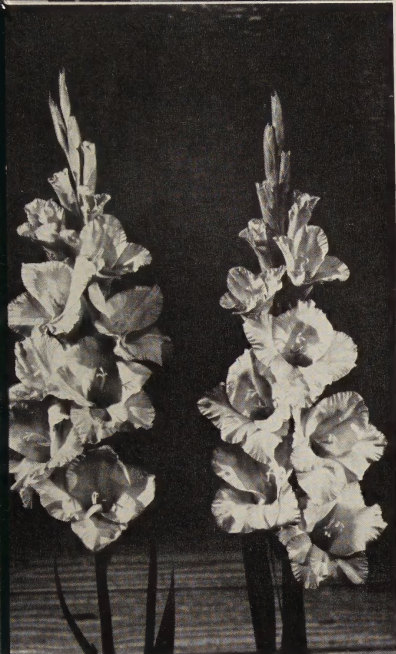

Until corms have cured they must be handled with great care or they will bruise, therefore stock is lifted by hand, topped close to the corm and placed into pails, then into our two-foot-square screen bottom storage trays. These trays are built to allow easy circulation of air which is an essential in correct storage. As soon as corms are ready to be cleaned, i. e., when the old bulb and roots break out easily, this is done and then they are graded to size. Our graders are cut one-eighth inch over size to allow for any shrinkage that might occur.

PROTECTION

Our hand labor, though costly, has proven itself of value to me as a seller and to you as a consumer. This combined with thorough cyanide-fumigation, corrosive sublimate dipping at planting time, correct storage temperature and moisture control will make WENTWORTH GARDEN Gladiolus of double importance and value to you.

- Complete cultural directions will be included in each shipment.
